SELE-FORGETTING.

BY PRANCES RIDLEY HAVEBOAL Let me try to lift the curtain

Holding other hearts from view; You complain, but are you certain That the fault is not in you?

In the summers sunny hours,
Sitting in your quiet room,
Can you wender if the flowers
Breathe for you so sweet a perfume

You must go to them, and stooping. Call the blossoms where thep live: On your besom gently drooping All their treasures will they give.

Fairly sought, some point of contact.
There must be with every mind,
And perhaps the closest compact.
Where we least expect to find.

Closed the heart-door of thy brother

All its treasures long concealed One key fails, then try another, Soon the rusty look must yield.

Seldom can the heart be lonely
